

Sandwich Critique

1. Who was your partner and what was their project?
 - My partner was Quinn Riley. Her project was developing a website based on rovers sent to mars.
2. Did you feel that having the sandwich template helped your critiquing efforts?
 - Yes, because it was basically an outline, and it helped organize my thoughts. Part of organizing my thoughts, it also developed a way that I could say my criticism without being rude or insensitive.
3. In which role did you feel the most/least comfortable; being evaluated or in the role of the evaluator?
 - I felt that I was more uncomfortable being the evaluator. The concept of HTML and CSS is very new to me and it is not one of my strengths. I felt that I wouldn't be able to give the criticism someone who does know a lot about the subject deserves.
4. What did you learn from interacting with your partner?
 - I learned a lot of things from Quinn. She taught me specific coding on how to manipulate pictures in my CSS. She also gave me tips about different HTML tags and the overall format of my website.
5. What do you feel were your strengths / weaknesses as an evaluator?
 - As an evaluator, my strength was approaching the website as a customer or as a viewer. I could give feedback of what a person would think if they were to browse the website. It also allowed me to give feedback concerning color scheme, font, and layout. My weakness was not having enough knowledge in the technicalities to actually give tips on how to fix the things I mentioned.
6. What would you do differently next time you found yourself in an ethical constructive feedback situation?
 - I would make sure that I knew more about the concept, and I will also keep in mind that even if I don't know much and outsider opinion is still strong.
7. Add in overall reflections you may have of your feedback situation.
 - I was very excited to do this and be evaluated. I'm always open to learning new things, and I knew that by getting criticism will help strengthen those weaknesses.
